Introduction

The XXI century is characterized by the processes of globalization, these processes have a deep impact on all spheres of society, in particular on public consciousness, the system of values and cultural relations. In the context of globalization, migration processes are becoming unprecedentedly active, becoming an important factor determining the transformation of public consciousness, and not only the movement of economic or labor resources.

From the point of view of social philosophy, migration is inextricably linked with issues of social ties in society, identity, cultural integration and social stability. In particular, the question of the impact of migration processes on public consciousness is one of the urgent scientific problems today. Since public consciousness is an important criterion for the development of society, changes in it determine the directions of further development of society.

The purpose of this article is a socio-philosophical analysis of the impact of migration processes on public consciousness in the context of globalization.

Socio-philosophical essence of the concept of migration

However, from the point of view of social philosophy, migration is a complex phenomenon that causes deep social and spiritual changes in the life of society. It has a significant impact on the formation of social status, values, worldview and public consciousness of the individual¹.

As a result of migration processes, different cultures, mentalities and social experience collide with each other. This state leads to the emergence of new stereotypes, views and forms of identity in the public consciousness. In this aspect, migration is one of the most important factors in the transformation of public consciousness.

Philosophically, migration is inextricably linked with the categories of "movement", "change" and "adaptation". These categories reveal the dialectical nature of the development of society and make it possible to understand migration as a natural process of social development².

Globalization and Transformation of Public Consciousness

The process of globalization has a direct impact on all forms of public consciousness - political, legal, moral, religious and aesthetic. On the other hand, migration is one of the most important mechanisms of this impact. In the context of globalization, migration enriches public consciousness, on the one hand, and creates certain risks for national identity and cultural continuity, on the other.

In the process of transformation of public consciousness, a complex relationship between global values and national values is formed. Migrants revise their values in the process of adaptation to a new social environment, as a result of which there is a process of synthesis in public consciousness³.

At the same time, migration processes lead to a rethinking in the public consciousness of such concepts as social justice, equality, and tolerance. This circumstance creates prerequisites for the formation of new social relations and social norms in society.

The Problem of Migration and Identity

The problem of identity is of particular importance in the analysis of the impact of migration processes on public consciousness. Identity is associated with the feeling of belonging to a certain social group, and this feeling changes significantly in the process of migration.

A migrant can have several identities at once: national, cultural, social and professional. This state gives rise to multifaceted and complex processes of identification in the public consciousness⁴.

From the point of view of social philosophy, migration indicates that identity is a dynamic phenomenon, not a fixed one. This contributes to the strengthening of the ideas of tolerance and cultural pluralism in society.

Migration and Public Consciousness in the Society of Uzbekistan

Migration processes in the society of Uzbekistan manifest themselves mainly in the form of labor migration. This process leads to the formation of new values, social experience and worldviews in the public consciousness.

As a result of labor migration, foreign socio-cultural experience penetrates into the national public consciousness. This circumstance, on the one hand, increases the openness of society, and on the other hand, makes the issue of preserving national values relevant.⁵

Socio-philosophical analysis shows that effective management of migration processes serves to strengthen social stability and social cohesion in the public consciousness.

Socio-philosophical consequences of migration

The impact of migration processes on public consciousness is complex and multifaceted, has both positive and negative aspects. Positive aspects include cultural enrichment, expansion of social experience, and the formation of a global worldview.

On the other hand, negative aspects are associated with the risk of social alienation, identity crisis, and cultural assimilation. Therefore, it is important to conduct a deep socio-philosophical analysis of migration processes and develop mechanisms for managing them⁶.

Thus, in the context of globalization, migration processes are one of the most important factors in the transformation of public consciousness. Migration has a significant impact on the system of values, identity and social relations of society. On the example of Uzbek society, the task of harmonizing migration processes with public consciousness, ensuring global integration with the preservation of national values remains relevant.
